How should I explain the difference between the following collections in a classroom setting? Dictionary has a set of string-value keys and a set of objects. List has a set of string-value keys and a set of objects that are of type T. HashMap only has a set of string-value keys. SortedList only has a set of string-value keys. I'm thinking of how to explain why SortedList is used in the Event Bus example for Hibernate: private static List messages = new ArrayList(); public synchronized void addMessage(Message message) { messages.add(message); notifyAll(); } A: From wikipedia: Dictionary is a set-based data structure where values are stored in a collection indexed by keys. It associates a key with a value. The normal operation of a dictionary is to search for a specified key-value combination and, if it is present, to retrieve the value associated with the key. List is a sequence-based data structure similar to array. Like array, List allows for easy insertion and removal, and offers a constant time performance to access an element by index. Unlike array, List provides a means to search for specific values using a binary search algorithm, which has a better worst case running time than linear search. Hashtable is a hash-based container in which the elements are key-value mappings. SortedList is a bucket-based sequence container. It is similar to list. Like list, it provides a fast iteration over all elements of a bucket-based
